Crime Prevention: Principles, perspectives and practices

Crime Prevention: Principles, perspectives and practices provides a comprehensive, example-based overview of prevention theory and practice. Unlike other books, it argues that contemporary governments can and should embrace crime prevention as a policy alternative to 'law and order' and, unlike most criminologists, the book's authors contend that crime prevention strategies should include both social prevention (programs addressing social causes of delinquency) and environmental prevention (reducing crime by minimising opportunities).

After arguing the case for prevention, Crime Prevention: Principles, perspectives and practices provides an overview of key approaches and analytical frameworks, and explains theories and techniques of both social and environmental prevention. Other issues discussed include program evaluation; crime prevention in Australia, the United Kingdom, other western European countries and the United States; crime prevention in public places; and crime prevention and public disorder.

This book is essential reading for professionals and students in the areas of crime prevention, criminology and sociology.

Adam Sutton is Associate Professor in the Department of Criminology at the University of Melbourne.

Adrian Cherney is Lecturer in the School of Justice Studies at the Queensland University of Technology.

Rob White is Professor of Sociology in the School of Sociology and Social Work, University of Tasmania.

Preface and acknowledgments

This book has been a long time in gestation, and is the product of lengthy and at times demanding discussions and debates. Largely because he is based in Melbourne, Adam Sutton has assumed the task of editorial coordination and for liaison with the publisher. In the latter stages of the book, due to unforeseen circumstances, Rob White had to take responsibility for final rewrites and overall editing. While each of us is the first author of individual chapters (Cherney of 2, 4 and 5; White of 7 and 8; and Sutton of 1, 3, 6 and 9) arguments of this book reflect our shared views.

Had it not been for Zoe Hamilton's patience, skill and diplomacy and her extremely constructive suggestions, this manuscript never would have seen the light of day. We also are grateful to Jill Henry, who preceded Zoe as Commissioning Editor, for coming up with the idea of a book on Crime Prevention. Finally we thank our partners Alessandra, Lorraine and Sharyn for their encouragement and support.
