Introduction. What is most looked forward in Utopian societies is the concept of justice. They seek justice both in state and in society (Walsh, 1975). According to some Utopian writers, the main reason of the corruption in the world is attitude to injustice. Thus, they, first of all, try to find the reasons of this injustice and inequality in the society. Both Plato and More take money and private property as the reason of this chaos, so in both of their Utopias, there is the abolition of money and private property. Yet, they differ in terms of their ideas on education and class system. According to Plato, in order to set up a just society, there should be division among labours. Every person is suited for a certain job and he/she should do his/her work, so social stability will be provided. And also, for Plato, the rulers should be philosopjjprs because they are the qualified ones than others. Thomas More, on the other hand, arranges similar working standards and working hours for people. Yet, although they are different in some of their Utopian visions, basically both writers seek the ways to eliminate the greediness, corruption, vanity and crimes in their societies.

Results and discussion. What concerns anti-utopian works, we can state that, on the other hand, the laws of justice do not work. Generally, there is not social equality among people and they do not have any rights to protest. There are hierarchical social classes in these societies. While some lucky ones seem superior, some others are inferior and it's their destiny. There are many inequalities in their lives. In Huxley's dystopia, Brave New World, for instance, people are divided into classes and there are sharp divisions between them starting from smart ones to inferiors; Alphas, Betas, Gammas, Deltas, and Epsilons. Everybody in the system, however, seems to be pleased with their situation except for some marginal characters who are conditioned from their very early age. The rest of the population seem to be obedient because their brains are washed, and they had already lost their individuality. In Orwell's dystopia, in the same way, there are Party members; Outer-Party and Inner-Party members. And also, there are Proles, populations who are the lowest part of the society. Other than these inequalities, when you commit a crime, you have no right to defend yourself. As an individual, you are always alone and succumbed.

The Utopian aim is an ideal community which posses a perfect socio-political legal system and circumstances. The rulers in this community try to create perfect environment governed by the laws that provide equality, freedom, and happiness to everyone. In dystopian communities, however, the state is represented as brutal and uncaring. Rather than working for the goodness of the population, the rulers, in dystopian communities search the ways to control and suppress the citizens in order to secure their position and their own interests. They condition, manipulate or brainwash the citizens by using various types of methods including advertising, media, regulations, technology, and philosophical or religious ideologic.

The horrible thing about the Two Minutes Hate was not that one obliged to act a part, but that it was impossible to avoid joining in. Within thirty seconds any pretence was always unnecessary. A hideous ecstasy of fear and vindictiveness, a desire to kill, to torture, to smash faces in with a sledge-hammer, seemed to flow through the whole group of people... (Orwell, 2013: 17).

It is important to mention that Utopian society is not interested in educated people, on the contrary, they try to keep people illiterate. Therefore, they will maintain their domination. It is such an egoistic, repressive and cruel system. In Ray Bradbury's famous dystopia, Fahrenheit 451°, for example, the state represses the intellectuals and forbids the reading of essential books. People's minds are filled with unnecessary things from TV, advertisements, such as products for consumerism. Nobody is interested in the realities of their world or what is really happening around them because they are blind to them. Books, which are seen as threats to status quo, are abolished and burned. Thus, it seems that whereas Utopian rulers seek ways to provide social harmony, dystopian rulers create social chaos.

Contrary to dystopian point of view, Utopia is not against freedom. Scientists assert that utopia struggles to give «true freedom, as individual men and women find their own destiny fulfilled by co-operating freely with the purposes of society» (Walsh, 1975: 71). Utopia creates an earthly welfare by rational planning but according to dystopian writers it is not so easy. For some dystopian writers, although Utopia seems to promise freedom, it is not so possible for an individual to flower as a part of the social whole. As an individual, he/she has his/her thoughts, ideas, longings and emotions, so his/her Utopia can also be a dystopia of others who have different world views (Постмодернизм, 2001: 74). At this point, dystopia comes into existence. In dystopia, freedom is totally destroyed. What is left is artificial liberties. In Nineteen Eighty-Four, people have no right to write, to question and even to think freely. There is always a crime of thought. In Never Let Me Go, q^ones have no rights even on their own bodies. Both their bodies and minds are exploited.

In spite of the fact that Utopia and dystopia seem to differ in many aspects, they share some important points. After all, in both Utopian and dystopian communities, what is aimed is to alter the existing social order. As Ruppert claims, «their shared effects lie in their thought — provoking power, in their capacity to intensify contradictions and to arouse a desire for change. The enemy of both Utopia and anti-utopia is the status-quo, which both seek to transform» (Koccaκ, 1980: 104). While Utopia gives the reader a hopeful image with a heaven-like picture that awakens our desire for change, dystopia provide us a negative picture that is full of hopelessness that arouses our fears even if it may seem a hopeful image with a heaven-like picture at first glance. In other words, in Utopian fiction, by creating a perfect environment, the writer tries to "make us aware of the distance between «the is» and «the ought». In dystopian fiction, however, this is done through satire and parody. They reimagine their present and create a plausible future.

Summing up we can state that although these two genres sometimes challenge each other, they flourishe side by side and they coexist, the tension between the two remained, linking them in a single arc. The underlying unity was a necessity of their continuing mutual survival. They fed off one another, deriving an equal and opposite energy from each other's affirmations and negations (Kumar, 1987: 126).

As hopeful and joyful picture of Utopia life gives way to the emergence Utopian fiction, the dark and distorted image of life gives way to the existence of dystopian fiction. The dystopian literature and its main concepts and themes will be analyzed in detail in the next section.

The novel «1984» is built on the acute conflict between Personality and State, freedom and fear. Its plot is dramatic, tense, the denouement is unusual, it provides the idea that under the pressure of society any person can be ruined. Outstanding characters of the book make it interesting and exciting for a wide circle of readers.

The main protagonist of the book is a usual misfit – intellectual with eloquent surname Winston Smith, which clearly speaks about his colourlessness and facelessness, the man is physically sick and weakened by bad food and beggarly existence. It is important to mention that Winston Smith is a marginal character. The marginal situations cause the appearance of so called cultural hybrids that balance between the dominant group of the society, the group which never accepts them and the group from which they dissociate (Оруэлл, 2012: 443).

Protest against regime arises in Winston's soul especially after unhappy family life. However, his protest is expressed only in seditious notes in his diary which themselves are considered to be crime punished by death. First of all for him any woman is a Party spy. Thus, such important feeling as love is transformed with this man into suspicion, hatred, hopelessness:

«Winston had disliked her from the first moment he saw her. He disliked nearly all women, especially young and pretty ones. The young women were always most loyal to the Party and were happiest to spy on others. But this girl was especially dangerous, he thought. Once, when he had seen her in the canteen, she had looked at him in a way that filled him with black terror. He even thought she might be working for the Thought Police» (62-63).

But it was already the strongest form of protest — Winston does not obey to the laws of totalitarian universum: criminal thought is the worst crime in that state. Дж. G. Orwell deals with the problem of subconscious analysing relations between men and women. All of a sudden Julia breaks into Winston's life. Though he hates practically all women, especially young and beautiful ones, to this woman he feels attraction and wants to take hold of her. At the same time, he is afraid of Julia and feels burning hatred to her because she is an embodiment of the regime. Julia is young, energetic, beautiful, practical, she is able to adapt to a situation (observe less important rules and you can violate more important ones).

«Julia was twenty-six years old. She lived in a Party buildingwith thirty other girls ('Always the smell of women! I hate women!' she said) and she worked, as he had guessed, on the story-writing machines. She enjoyed her job, looking after a powerful electric motor» (42).

Julia is in love and she can share everything with her beloved man. She also hates the Party but the reason is that this Party deprives her of pleasures. However, in contrast to Winston, she understands why sex is strictly forbidden, she likes to seduce party members and indulge in carnal joys together with them. Contrary to Katrin, who was Mrs. Smith once, Julia is a normal woman. The latter, according to G. Orwell is a foolish, vulgar, empty creature, «a walking gramophone». Katrin is a shining example of what the Party is trying to make out of a usual «warm» woman. In his turn Winston dreams that such women as Julia were more and the party would rot from inside, that it would cover with siphilic chancres. But after the love-protest, after the love-despair there comes real love and the special flavour of danger is changed with the premonition of quick death.

«Life, as she saw it, wasquite simple. You wanted a good time, they (meaning the Party) wanted to stop you having it, so you broke the rules as well as you could» (52).

It is clearly seen that creating a character G. Orwell, as a writer, reflects the features of a real person in it. Personality of O'Brian, a high rank party member, constantly worried Winston. He could not understand what troubled him more: the unusual combination of an intellectual and a boxer — weightlifter in O'Brian's appearance or his insincere, in Winston's opinion, devotion to the Party ... Winston's liking for him and total confidence in this man, who morally degraded long ago, is simply impressing. O'Brien is a worthy son of his system. He covered Winston with a web of lies and brought him to where people ruin themselves, that is to say to his doom. Indifferent to any party in the world Julia followed him to satisfy his interest in the world order. They are eager to tell a lie, to betray, to douse children with acid, but not for the sake of the Elder Brother, they have chosen another God for themselves, Goldstein.

The system created them in a way they match it. But they did not agree to sacrifice their love. And this is already challenge, which the Party takes up with pleasure. G. Orwell underlines that subconsious is not always beautiful it can be ugly and awful.

E. Cossak states that dissection is the main feature of the novel. It reveals itself at different levels: material wealth, plan excess according to all indices, slogans and reality. Thus, they are mistaken, or maybe they did not think that they prefer one totalitarian regime to another one, they want to change a moustached fellow for a man with a goatee (Κοccaκ, 1980: 203).

It is important to mention that one the protagonists of the novel «1984» is the Elder Brother. The prototype for this image was the leader of the Soviet state J. Stalin The description of this character's appearance and of his inner world correspond to the personality of that bloody dictator. Besides the novel shows the cult of personality of The Elder Brother which was artificially manufactured in the Soviet Union. «At the end of the hall a poster covered one wall/ It showed an enormous face, more than a metre wide: the face of a handsome man of about forty-five, with a large, black moustache. The man's eyes seemed to follow Winston as he moved. Below the face were the words B I G B R O T H E R IS W A T C H I N G Y O U» (13).

Conclusions. Gradually gaining strength fear breaks a human's moral and makes him keep all his feelings inside except the instinct for self-preservation. In such a state fear produces constant mimicry until the ability to see things as they really are is absolutely destroyed. The state must only facilitate quick and irrevocable flow of this process. It is also important to mention that in the novel «1984» G. Orwell shows himself as a creator of literary images which cannot be forgotten. His aim is to depict the psycological portrait of his characters, appearance has the secondary meaning.
