

Pain R.

Everyday Terrorism: Connecting Domestic Violence and Global Terrorism.

Progress in Human Geography 2014, 38(4), 531-550.

Copyright:

© 2014 The Authors. Reprinted by permission of SAGE Publications.

DOI link to article:

<https://doi.org/10.1177/0309132513512231>

Date deposited:

24/11/2017

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial 3.0 Unported License

Everyday terrorism: connecting domestic violence and global terrorism

He'd punch me and he kicked me...he dragged me by the hair you know, he pushed me up and down the stairs, he stamped on my feet, he'd always get me round like this really hard and he'd break my clothes and he'd bruise my neck and he'd grab my arms and he'd shake me...

But my job that used to kick in when that was happening was "I have to, the way I'm going to stop this, the way I'm going to protect the children, is I'm going to become his counsellor, I'm going to become his therapist, and I'm going to calm him down and I'll say and do anything I have to, to calm him down" and that's the bit that really pisses me off...

I sort of began to realise later on that "this is terrorism, right?" because, you know, he had got what he wanted by doing that. And OK he'd only have to do it occasionally, but then I was living with this constant watchfulness, anxiety, you know, self-regulation, and I would do anything to make sure that couldn't happen. But at the same time there was nothing I could do to make sure it couldn't happen, because it was so random. And it wasn't my fault, I eventually realised.

Jennifer¹

I Introduction

This paper argues that that the intimate and structural dynamics of terrorism experienced in the home not only reflect violence in the international arena, but have shared foundations and direct points of connection. Building on work in feminist political geography and international relations, both terrorisms are framed as intimate and structural, global and everyday, at once. Geographers' preference has been for global terrorism as an object of study; our treatment of it as a phenomenon that is unrelated to intimate violence neatly reflects the disproportionate recognition and resourcing that the state gives to the least prevalent form of terrorism. This has negative consequences for both understanding and responding to the experiences of victims and survivors.

The analysis here centres on the role of fear. Domestic violence does not only - or even mostly - consist of acts of physical violence, although these are often present. It includes psychological and emotional tactics including threats, isolation and undermining self confidence. The severity of its impacts centre on the common operation of fear, terror and control (Dobash and Dobash, 1979; Stark, 2007). Domestic violence is a widespread and everyday phenomenon in higher and lower income countries alike, that appears to cut across boundaries of class, age, ethnicity and sexual orientation (McCue, 2008). A review of European studies suggests that around one in four women experience domestic violence over their lifetime, and between 6-10% in any given year (Council of Europe, 2002). Men make up 10-30% of victims of domestic violence (Hester 2009; Walby and Allen 2004)². Domestic violence is marked by its repeated and long-term nature, and is a social issue that has serious consequences for the physical and mental health of those who experience it, is a major cause of family breakup, affects patterns of housing and income, and has far-reaching implications for the wellbeing, social and emotional development of children (Abrahams, 2010; Hester et al., 2006).

Yet domestic violence does not receive the levels of attention and resourcing that it merits. In the current context of austerity in western countries, services for victims and survivors³ have seen brutal cuts. Here is a crime as close to home as it gets, but there is a persistent tendency to minimise its significance in comparison with more public forms of violence. This paradoxical distancing, partly explained by the spatialities of domestic violence (Pain, 1997; Warrington, 2001), is often reflected in personal as well as societal attitudes, and follows through to the presences and absences in geographical scholarship on violence. Since 2001, the war on/of terror has sparked an enormous literature on global terrorism and the politics of security, while domestic violence has been the focus of little more than 10 articles by geographers. As feminists have observed, phenomena and events that are commonly viewed as public, political, global and spectacular continue to have wider appeal as subjects of study than the private and apparently mundane (Katz, 1996; Marston et al, 2005; Pain, 2009; Rose, 1993; Sharp, 2007; Staeheli et al., 2004). Domestic violence is the elephant in the room. We know it is present, not just as something that happens in distant locations to distant others, but in many of our own lives; but perhaps it feels too large, awkward and close to home to lay bare, causing us to ask difficult questions about security, space, privilege and power.

Geographers' burgeoning work on global terrorism, meanwhile, offers a field of sophisticated political and spatial analysis (for example, Closs Stephens and Vaughan-Williams, 2009; Elden, 2007; Flint 2003; Gregory, 2004; Hannah, 2006). Terrorism is rare in most parts of the world, and especially the western countries that are the focus of much of this research; geographers' emphasis has been on the impacts of the threat and fear of global terrorism on international relations and domestic governance, including the state terrorism that some western governments perpetrate or support as part of their response. There is relatively little empirical attention to the experiential, emotional and everyday dimensions of global terrorism (Pain, 2010; Rapin, 2009). Domestic violence is intimately bound, too, into national and global politics, and profoundly shaped by state and social responses.

The aim of this review is to connect and bring into dialogue theories and evidence about global terrorism and domestic violence, suggesting that this might enrich our understanding of each. The meta-project, following feminist geographers' lead (for example, Dowler 2012; Hyndman, 2003; Pain and Smith, 2008; Pratt 2012; Pratt and Rosner, 2006; Staeheli et al., 2004), is to collapse the scaling of these different forms of violence, drawing together mainstream and feminist analyses of different terrorisms from across the social and political sciences. This is not to present a simplistic argument that they, or any forms of violence, are the same, but to argue for a remapping of the geographies of terrorism. The review is mainly confined to everyday and global terrorism as they are experienced in the west. It draws on some research on colonized and postcolonial settings, and this and anti-racist feminist analyses provide especial impetus for unsettling the distinction between international and interpersonal violence. Discourses of fear of both everyday and global terrorisms are characterised by their whiteness.

To delimit the task, the focus in this paper is on the ways that emotions operate in these different forms of terrorism, particularly the politics of fear which have been described as central to both (Dobash and Dobash, 1979; Goodwin, 2006). The detailed workings of domestic violence as emotional warfare are explored elsewhere (Pain 2013; Pain and Scottish Womens Aid 2012). The next section expands the framing of domestic violence as everyday terrorism. The following section identifies a conceptual framework which positions both terrorisms within the everyday and wider social and political formations. The rest of the paper attends to four interrelated themes. First, it argues that the politics of both terrorisms operate across scales rather than being restricted to global or everyday securities. Second, it examines the politics, experience and role of fear in spatial entrapment, trauma, resistance to terrorism and survival. Third, it explores social responses to terrorism, and the importance of public recognition in survival and recovery. Finally, it focuses on the role of the state in counter-terrorism strategies, demonstrating once more the intimate connections between local and global securities.

II Framing domestic violence as everyday terrorism

“Not every form of violence that is evil or reprehensible...constitutes terrorism.”

Lutz (2010: 37)

Since 2001, ‘terrorism’ has become more commonplace in western language and thought; discourses, images and metaphors around it have proliferated (Burke, 2009; Onuf, 2009; Richardson, 2006). Lutz (2010) makes this corrective (above) in a critique of the new ‘critical terrorism studies’ (see Franks, 2006; Jackson 2007) - he argues that labelling an ever wider range of violence ‘terrorism’ risks losing sight of terrorism’s specific features. Most importantly, terrorism is a form of violence that attempts political influence or control through instilling fear (Goodwin, 2006). Domestic violence stands out from other everyday crimes in this respect. In the rest of the paper I refer to domestic violence as ‘everyday terrorism’, while ‘global terrorism’ refers to terrorism in national and international settings, including state terrorism. This terminology is used to distinguish between them, to identify connections, and to remind us of their relative frequency. I want to be sure to move the analysis beyond facile comparison. Rather than arguing that global and everyday terrorism are the same, the paper identifies similarities and discontinuities, asks how each form of violence is constructed, mediated, used and responded to by individuals, communities and the state, and what the significance is for remapping terrorism.

Asking these questions is a political as well as an intellectual exercise. Framing domestic violence as everyday terrorism draws attention to its horror and severity (Hammer, 2002). It muddies the boundaries between forms of violence that are usually framed as public, political and spectacular, and forms that are usually framed as private, apolitical and mundane. The terminology also highlights the marginalisation of feminist theory from mainstream debates around terror (Sjoberg 2009), and provides an opportunity to connect feminist scholarship on violence across family studies, psychiatry and psychotherapy, political studies and geography.

A handful of previous analyses have discussed both domestic violence and terrorism. First, in research in family studies over two decades, Michael Johnson (1995, 2008) has used the terms 'patriarchal terrorism' and 'intimate terrorism' to distinguish severe controlling violence from other less serious 'types' of domestic violence. In so doing he identifies that women are overwhelmingly more likely than men to be victims of more serious abuse. However, while his threefold typology has been strategically useful in some parts of the women's movement, it is problematic in its implication that incidents are not connected along a spectrum of violence; they may both be productive of power and control (Anderson, 2008). Compelling recent arguments about coercive control in abuse (Stark 2007) show it can lead to the same negative social and psychiatric outcomes even without physical violence being present. In this paper, domestic violence is understood to involve control executed through physical, psychological and/or emotional abuse, rather than one-off incidents of physical violence which may be more widely understood as 'fights' (Stark 2007).

Secondly, the psychiatrist Judith Herman (1992, 1997), in her powerful account of trauma, draws together the experience of and recovery from war, terrorism, child and domestic abuse; she does not refer to domestic violence as terrorism, but draws close parallels in terms of experience and psychological responses (see Section IV). Thirdly, Ruth Phillips (2008) has eloquently demonstrated how the politics of the war on/of terror are intimately linked with those of domestic violence, in the Australian government's failures regarding women's domestic security. She cites the Australian Women's Intra Network's (2006) critique of the government for ignoring 'domestic terrorism'. Fourthly, Rhonda Hammer's (2002, 2003) radical feminist analysis recasts domestic violence as 'family terrorism', as a strategy to counter an anti-feminist backlash which has downplayed the commonness of domestic violence as a form of gendered power relations. Following Jones (1994), Hammer (2002) rejects the term 'domestic violence' as sounding like a tame, less severe form of violence that victims are complicit in. As she argues, much of the language now commonly employed ('conjugal violence', 'spouse abuse', 'intimate partner violence') is ideologically rooted, implying that both partners are responsible, neutralizing violence and denying its complexity. While Hammer uses the term 'family terrorism' for these reasons, and hooks (2000) uses 'patriarchal violence' to signify its causality, I use 'everyday terrorism' to flag the dynamics, severity and impacts of domestic violence.

Naming domestic abusers as terrorists applies to white and non-white perpetrators. While men of colour are more likely to be labelled violent in white western societies, in reality they, and women of colour, are at heightened risk from a range of violences. A significant literature, still often overlooked in policy and academic work, has highlighted the universalism and whiteness of mainstream theories of and responses to everyday terrorism, including parts of the anti-violence movement. Terroristic intimate violence is a specific and common pattern of abusive behaviour which cuts across class, ethnicity and sexual orientation. However, the context in which it occurs profoundly shapes its meaning and opportunities to respond to it. Terrorism within the home is a different experience in a political context of routine violence from the state or a colonizing power; and in the west, women of colour are also at high risk of racist violence, particularly when leaving violent domestic relationships (Crenshaw 1991; hooks 2000; INCITE! 2006; Sokaloff and Dupont 2005). Accounts of fear in everyday terrorism and its consequences tend to overlook these differences, just as the common portrayal of fear in analysis of global terrorism is reflective of the condition of whiteness (Pain 2009). Both need to be challenged. Indeed, the war on/of (global) terror operates through the deployment of ideas of sexuality and race (Bhattacharyya 2008; Puar 2007), particularly the racialisation of terrorist bodies. However, while fear and other responses to terrorism in the west predominantly impact on Muslim and Arab communities (Pain 2010).

III Conceptualising the global and the everyday

Feminist political geographers have long insisted on rupturing global/local binaries (Dowler 2012; Dowler and Sharp, 2001; Hyndman, 2001; Katz, 2004; Pratt and Rosner, 2006; Staeheli et al., 2004). These binaries underpin the distinction between global and everyday terrorisms, and the different levels of attention they receive. Pratt (2012) draws a related argument, in her sophisticated dismantling of scale in analysis of intimate and state violences experienced by Filipino migrant domestic workers in Canada. Here, to frame discussion of the relations between everyday and global terrorism, I draw on a previous framework for understanding geographies of fear as present in both global geopolitics and everyday life (Pain and Smith 2008). Having argued that existing models for thinking about the geopolitics of fear conceive the geopolitical and the everyday as two distinct realms, fixed in a hierarchical relationship where global security practices and discourses drip down into the manifestation of local fear, we proposed a visual motif based on the double helix in the structure of DNA which removes any spatial hierarchy. This represents a feminist take on scale; two equivalent strands (geopolitics and everyday life) wind into a single structure and form the building blocks of every assemblage of fear. The two are bound together by numerous connectors, which are:

...events, encounters, movements, dialogues, actions, affects and things: the materials that connect and conjoin geopolitics and everyday life. But these engagements are fragile...the breaks and discontinuities that occur – both randomly and in patterned ways – might represent the awkward, unfinished, disunited, conflicting nature of relations between the geopolitical and the everyday; but ultimately they are inter-reliant and complementary.

Pain and Smith (2008: 7)

For the current analysis, this model recognises that neither everyday or global terrorism is more or less important than the other, neither exists solely at one scale and nor should they be analysed as such; instead, they are parts of the same broader structures that sometimes interweave, and there are both connections and disconnections between them. The analysis that follows focuses on four interconnecting themes, and includes national responses to each terrorism which mediate between the global and everyday.

IV Multiscalar politics and securities: remapping the rights and responsibilities of safety

First, not only are both forms of terrorism political, but these politics operate across scales rather than being restricted to global or everyday securities. The definition of global terrorism is contested and politicized, as it occurs across a wide range of political situations and goals, actors and places (Burke, 2009; Tilly, 2004). As Flint and Radil (2009) point out, many attempts to define terrorism reflect the power of those defining it, and their wish to delegitimize and stigmatize opponents. Nonetheless, fear is widely recognised as fundamental to terrorism:

The consequences of the violence are themselves merely a first step and form a stepping stone toward objectives that are more remote...Terrorism is violence used in order to create fear; but it is aimed at creating fear in order that the fear, in turn, will lead somebody else - not the terrorist - to embark on some quite different program of action that will accomplish whatever it is that the terrorist really desires.

(Fromkin, 1975, 692-3)

Terrorism, then, is an attempt to impose or disrupt an order or through violence and fear (Flint and Radil, 2009; Goodwin, 2006; Onuf, 2009). Global terrorism aims to have these effects within 'macro-political geographic settings' (Flint and Radil, 2009: 151), an upscaling which is especially pertinent to the fourth wave of terrorism (Rapoport, 2004) currently held to be dominating global security. Flint and Radil urge some caution here, as overly focusing on the recent war on/of terror risks losing sight of wider patterns in global conflict where broader political and economic processes, especially colonialism and post-colonial trends, are central to explaining global terrorism.

Equally, everyday terrorism is political, contested, and understood by its capacity to instil fear through coercive control (Stark, 2007). If power and control are seen as involving varying and fluid configurations, entanglements and struggles (Sharp et al., 2000), then we can position terrorism as a relevant framing across scales and violent acts of insurgent groups, the state, and family members. Earlier feminist analyses of domestic violence viewed it as innately political and as an exertion of power: 'force and its threat is never a residual or secondary mode of influence, rather it is the structural underpinning of hierarchical relations' (Hammer, 1978: 229). Patriarchy was the first political and social system that was considered both to produce and be produced by everyday terrorism (Dobash and Dobash, 1979). It has since been recognised as intersected by racism, ethnocentrism, class privilege, heterosexism and ablism to produce diverse experiences of violence (Harne and Radford, 2008; hooks, 2000; Mama, 1996; Menjívar and Salcido 2002; Sokoloff and Dupont, 2005). Many feminist and anti-racist analysts find poverty and material conditions to produce be intensified by everyday terrorism (Fine, 2012; Fine et al., 1998; Hammer, 2002; hooks 2000; for a quantitative geographical analysis see Di Bartolo, 2006), although as Sokoloff and Dupont (2005) note, class analysis is often the least developed in intersectional analyses. As discussed in Section II, everyday terrorism is also shaped by contexts of colonization and globalization and reinforces their most harmful effects (Hammer, 2002; hooks, 2000; INCITE! 2006; cf. Flint and Radil above).

Surprisingly few geographers have contributed to analysis of everyday terrorism by considering how place and scale intersect with these political structures. Brickell (2008) is one exception, linking intimate violence and national politics in her analysis of gender-based violence in Cambodia as it undergoes transition. Nayak (2005) also carefully draws place into her analysis of variations in violence against women between Indian states, implicating the political geographies of gender relations, especially movements to improve women's status and an associated and antithetical 'revivalist' backlash which may underpin regional and neighbourhood differences.

The complex politics of both global and everyday terrorisms operate across scales. Although everyday terrorism is experienced within the home and family, feminist analysis upscales its causes and effects, as the above discussion makes clear. And as geographers have identified, global terrorism, securitization and militarization are inserted into the everyday through state activities, popular culture, material practices and counter-terrorism measures (Amoore, 2007; Dowler 2012; Graham, 2010). Katz (2007: 350-51) describes how, in response to the war on/of terror, the security state 'produces a sense of terror and fear in a drivelly and everyday way...the material social practices of banal terrorism work at all scales'. Global terrorism, then, may be extremely rare in the west, but has become part of our everyday lives and environments. However, its presence reflects highly delineated and politically motivated discourses of threat and risk, rather than our common experiences of violence itself. The far more familiar phenomenon of everyday terrorism is also spatially present, but less visibly: on bodies harmed by violence, in private homes where doors, furniture and possessions are marked by attacks, and in the withdrawal of victims because of spatial entrapment (Warrington, 2001). The key difference here is that despite the commonness of everyday terrorism, it tends to be hidden or excused: it is distanced despite its everywhere-ness, and marked by a lack of spatial fetishism. The terrorism that the state makes paradoxically banal is the one which is extremely rare. But, in common, representations of both terrorisms serve to 'obscure and mystify the social, cultural and political-economic relations' that underpin them (Katz, 2007: 352).

Further, the masculinist protection described by feminists as framing international security (Young, 2003) underpins political responses to both forms of terrorism. Security is understood as a set of practices aimed at avoiding current and anticipated future dangers, often involving control and sometimes violence itself. Scholars in feminist international relations and feminist political geography have questioned and remapped understanding of security, and whose rights and responsibilities are prioritised in academic analyses, state discourses and actions (Hunt and Rygiel, 2006; Hyndman, 2007; Staeheli and Nagel, 2008). To protect 'economic, sovereign and political interests that have been defined by men through war, conflict and diplomacy for centuries' (Phillips, 2008: 60), the protector state excludes discourses that challenge its power. Young (2003: 226-8) describes how, since 2001, a new security regime in the US has enacted the logic 'you subordinate your actions to our judgment of what is necessary, and we promise to keep you safe', mirroring the patriarchal sexual contract (Pateman, 1988). Similarly, in everyday terrorism, abusers commonly position themselves as the more ethical partner (Jones 2004) and as victims' protectors (Hearn, 1996), and related critiques have been made of paternalistic state responses (Walklate, 2008).

Everyday violence is also fundamentally related to global security, both conceptually and experientially (Eisenstein, 2007; Hammer, 2003; Hoogensem and Rottem, 2004; Moser 2001; Sjoberg, 2009). For example, in the underpinning of militarism and state security by hypermasculinity that has also been held to explain failures to effectively tackle domestic violence (Hammer, 2003; hooks, 2000; INCITE! 2006); in the drive to 'rescue' women from oppression overseas unasked, bypassing local women's movements (Hyndman, 2003; Hunt and Rygiel, 2006; Young, 2003), also reflected in problematic criminal justice approaches to everyday terrorism in the west (Walklate, 2008); and in the erasure of other knowledges and voices in determining political responses to global and everyday terrorisms (Hyndman, 2003; INCITE! 2006; Stanko, 2006; Sylvester, 1994; Walklate, 2008). Recent research has also highlighted the direct effect of living in a context of war and terrorist attacks on intimate violence, the associated dilemmas for international human rights responses (see Johnson P., 2008; Sela-Shayovitz, 2010), the effects of military culture on everyday terrorism perpetrated by soldiers against their families, and how, in highly militarised societies such as Israel/Palestine, this everyday violence itself becomes militarised (Adelman, 2003). Writing on the USA, Jones (2013) makes a powerful case that the endemic societal practice of everyday terrorism directly informs the nature of international violence.

This co-dependence of everyday and global terrorisms disrupts, rescales and reorients geographies of violence. Feminist research is 'acknowledging securities laterally, democratically, and in mutually influential and dynamic ways...[as] a multiplicity of securities flowing concurrently' (Hoogensem and Rottem, 2004: 169); to the question 'whose securities matter most?', we might add 'whose terrorisms matter most?'

V Fear and trauma: beyond entrapment

Fear is central to both global terrorism (Goodwin, 2006) and everyday terrorism (Dobash and Dobash, 1979). In literatures on global terrorism, fear and trauma are often mentioned, but their existence and effects are more often assumed than empirically documented: emotions are something of an absent presence (Pain, 2009, 2010). In contrast, research on everyday terrorism makes a much stronger case for the presence and political roles of fear and trauma; they are fundamental to the social structures of power and control that create and compound women's vulnerability and insecurity (Brownmiller, 1975; Dobash and Dobash, 1992; Hanmer, 1978). Since this pioneering work, however, emotions have tended to be analysed in quite a singular way that has some limits conceptually and empirically. This section reviews research on fear and trauma in both forms of terrorism, identifying some limitations and gaps.

1 Spatial entrapment in terrorism

Constructions of the home, as the main setting for abuse, are seen as paramount in the small body of geographical work on everyday terrorism. Its historical precedents of privacy and male authority still too often allowing violence to be exercised with impunity (Duncan, 1996). In a landmark piece in geography, Warrington (2001) highlights the disjuncture between violence and the notion of the home as a safe space, and the spatial restrictions women experience both while experiencing violence and while trying to leave abusive relationships. Bowstead (2011: 12) uses Foucault's panopticism to understand the spatiality of surveillance in abusive relationships: as with prison inmates, abusers may use tactics of isolation and watchfulness to control and accuse victims, so that 'no aspect of the woman's life is her own'. Meth's (2003: 326) research in South Africa muddies assumptions about gender, violence and the public/private divide, arguing that feminist understandings of the home are 'largely western, and unsophisticated in terms of their sensitivity to difference and inequality'. Addressing this lack, Datta's (2012) study of squatter homes in Delhi identifies how the notion of 'legitimate domesticities' positions certain homes and families between morality and the law, and more or less subject to manifestations of power such as violence. Meanwhile research in rural areas demonstrates how these settings compound the social and physical entrapment of everyday terrorism (Panelli et al., 2005; Pruitt, 2008; Wendt and Cheers, 2003).

The importance of setting in everyday terrorism is highlighted in Herman's (1992, 1997) work on trauma, in which she links the experiences of survivors of violent atrocities including torture, concentration camps, rape and domestic abuse. Notably, survivors of everyday terrorism experience post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) at similar rates and intensities to survivors of international violence (Herman, 1997): symptoms are present in 31% to 84% of women survivors of everyday terrorism (Humphreys and Joseph, 2004). As Thien and Del Casino (2012: 1151) put it, PTSD is itself a condition that is 'spatially confounding...a vertigo-like placing of the sufferer into another time and place'. The crux of Herman's argument is that prolonged abuse leads to a different kind of fear and trauma (and 'complex PTSD'; see Herman, 1992), arising from specific conditions including a setting from which escape is difficult, and a perpetrator who may appear normal. Everyday abuse and entrapment work through psychological as well as physical control. In an intimate context, the terrorist's justification for violence is very powerful. Prolonged trauma in these cases 'invades and erodes the personality' (Herman, 1997: 86); it may lead to psychological changes including depression, internalisation, self-hatred and, often, victims taking responsibility for the abuse. There is still little understanding of these psychological dimensions of fear and trauma, and of why it is so difficult for victims to leave (Humphreys and Joseph, 2004; Stark, 2007). A majority of those in abusive relationships fear that they or their children will be killed if they leave, and indeed violence often continues and escalates after separation (Humphreys and Tiara, 2002).

Fear is relational, and in everyday terrorism it is enmeshed with a complex of emotions situated within cultural norms of care and moral obligation, shame and guilt (Montalvo-Liendo, 2008). For male victims, who are significantly less likely to feel fear of serious injury or death (Hester, 2009; Swan et al., 2008), these obligations can also present strong reasons for not disclosing abuse. Fears for children are crucial. Others outside the couple have a key role in reinforcing or challenging these feelings (Pain and Scottish Womens Aid 2012). As such, the emotional aspects of everyday terrorism exist within a wider system of gendered power relations, rather than reflecting individual struggles within dysfunctional families (Hammer, 2002).

In global terrorism, citizens' emotional registers are also harnessed for political ends (Robin 2004). Again, constructions of home are central in this; in the US government's response to global terrorism, domestic metaphors abound, and heteronormative family life is writ large in policy and public safety advice (Cowen and Gilbert 2008; Puar 2007). The lockdown of one million people after the 2013 Boston bombings positioned the home as a place of high security, despite the risks of everyday terrorism and gun crime there (Berrington 2013). This parallels the paradoxical nature of safety advice given to women to stay home and avoid public space when serial rapists are at large (e.g. Sandberg and Rönnblom 2013). Whose securities, from which terrorisms, do these state responses prioritise?

2 Questioning fear and resistance in terrorism

This control through invoking public fears is one of the aims of recent global terrorism (Hannah, 2006; Rumford, 2009). But like everyday terrorism, global terrorism is emotionally complex, if nations can be thought of as having particular emotional relationships that may change over time (Moisi, 2009). As well as reflecting fear and hate between political factions in conflict, terrorism is often positioned as altruistic (Gupta, 2008) and reflective of religious or nationalist devotion, and may belie historical legacies of alliance or patronage between groups who are now opponents (Hyndman, 2003). In recent literatures on the war on/of terror by geographers and political scientists, it is fear which is routinely invoked as ubiquitous. But fear is usually simply read off from state actions 'with little or no reference to the feelings, perceptions, views, subjectivities or bodies of those who are supposed to be fearful' (Pain, 2009: 471). While significant trauma has been documented for individuals and communities directly involved in terrorist attacks (for example, Clark et al., 2011; Edkins, 2007, 2008; London Assembly, 2006; Robins, 2003; Tulloch, 2006), research in a number of countries has found little fear among wider populations resulting from recent terrorist attacks on the west (Pain 2010). Even in contexts where terrorism is more frequent, people's defiance and resilience may grow (Coady, 1985) and fear may even decrease (Rapin, 2009). Pain et al. (2010) draw similar conclusions from qualitative research, arguing that people's agency and a range of other emotions are often overlooked in broad statements about fear.

I want to take this questioning of fear - what it is, and what it does - further. For both global and everyday terrorism, the literatures reviewed so far tend to deploy a rather monolithic conception of fear, positioning it as a negative and disempowering emotional force that allows different sorts of hegemonic power to prevail. In the case of global terrorism, it does not always live up to its intent of instilling fear, and its achievement of political influence is very mixed. Everyday terrorism creates more fear and trauma because it is more frequent, prolonged, and takes place within the intimate sphere. Yet many victims contest violence in different ways. None are passive. Some fight back physically (Hester, 2009), while others gather resources and develop strategies to resist it (Harne and Radford 2008, McCue, 2008). Many undergo the long process of becoming survivors, eventually leaving the abusive relationship and reconstructing their lives (Abrahams, 2010; Herman, 1997; Tamas 2011). The subject positions of abusers and abused may be multiple, messy and shifting (Tamas 2011); power and resistance are not coherent or stable, but entangled together (Sharp et al., 2000). Terrorism and fear do not simply work smoothly. More attention is needed to how victims' and survivors' 'exertion of power, resistance and agency emanates from such disadvantaged positions' (Hammer, 2002: 124), as much as the ability or willingness of protectors such as the state to relieve their fears. Fear itself can be a means to contest power and seek survival, at the same time as it is a central element of entrapment (Pain 2013). Again, the geographies of terrorism may be central to these processes - for example, in her analysis of women's journeys in response to everyday terrorism, Bowstead (2011) theorises space as both a constraint and a resource. This acknowledgement of resistance is not to romanticise survival, or overstate the possibilities of rising above fear (Hammer 2002; Jones 1994). Remaining in an abusive relationship can require as much courage as leaving, and too many victims do not survive. Rather than individualise survival, then, a shift to collective social responsibility for everyday terrorism is required.

VI Survival and recovery: recognising violence as a collective responsibility

'Remembering and telling the truth about terrible events are prerequisites both for the restoration of the social order and for the healing of individual victims.' Making this direct link between individual and societal recovery from violence, Herman (1997: 1) begins her account of the experience of trauma and the healing processes by which victims become survivors. There are differences within and across both the medical profession and feminist movement on the course of these processes, particularly surrounding the importance and treatment of PTSD (Humphreys and Joseph, 2004). Nonetheless, the broad processes that Herman outlines may be found in many psychotherapeutic responses to those who are chronically traumatized from prolonged terror. She describes five stages of recovery: a healing relationship, safety (naming the problem and regaining control), remembrance and mourning (acknowledgement of trauma and loss), reconnection with ordinary life (developing a new self and creating a future), and commonality (making links with others to challenge the isolation of trauma). These stages may be seen as heuristic devices aimed at healing, as trauma and recovery are messy, non-linear, and subject to different retellings (Bondi 2013; Tamas 2009, 2011).

Significantly, Herman identifies social contact and support as vital in recovery, whether through a psychotherapeutic relationship or everyday contact with friends, family and others. Research on everyday terrorism confirms that informal support is more likely to be drawn upon than formal services, and is crucial to surviving and leaving violent relationships (Barrett and St Pierre, 2011; Clark and Hamby, 2011; Stanko, 2006). Many victims take a long time, even years, to disclose everyday terrorism to anyone, and those in ethnic minority groups (Barrett and St Pierre, 2011; Humphreys and Joseph, 2004; Montalvo-Liendo, 2008) and male victims (Walklate and Allan, 2004) are least likely to disclose. As a form of terrorism that society as a whole tends to minimise – indeed, which works through fear, shame and entrapment – visible and routine acknowledgement from the wider community and society plays a key role in healthy survival. It is also important in prevention, through deterring perpetrators, priming others to support victims and survivors, and especially in the lessons that children and young people learn and take forward, whether they have witnessed abuse or not (Barrett and St Pierre, 2011; Scottish Executive 2003; Scottish Women’s Aid 2010).

For victims of terrorism linked to global or national struggles, the experience of collective recognition often differs markedly. In the west, such violence is widely reported, recognised and memorialised, indeed publicity is one of the intentions behind this form of terrorism (Flint and Radil, 2009; Onuf, 2009; Richardson, 2006). Attacks on western cities since 2001 have been especially successful if judged on these terms, receiving unprecedented media coverage, and a whole range of formal and informal practices of memory-work instigated in response to the trauma which was felt (Clark et al., 2011; Edkins, 2007, 2008; Robins, 2003). As Edkins (2004) has argued, this trauma is already collective as well as individual, situated in the lived environments and social worlds in which terrorist attacks and their aftermath take place (see also Smelser, 2004). This collective recognition and expression of trauma is missing from the much wider pandemic of everyday terrorism.

This is not to say that collective recognition of global terrorism and the notion of social trauma is not problematic or disunited. Like the attacks they commemorate, practices of recognition and memorialisation are diversely interpreted, contested and open to political manipulation. It is well documented in national conflicts that memory-work and commemoration are frequently used - often through spatial practices such as street-naming, marching and murals - to assert or challenge political authority, and, through collective emotional framing, to recast violent acts as political struggles (Brown, 2011; McDowell, 2012). After the 2005 London bombings, a number of accounts of nation and community were in circulation (Closs Stephens, 2007), while emotions following the attacks on New York in 2001 led to diverse reactions. There was an immediate rush to memorialisation, both organic and planned (Edkins, 2003). Both grieving and memorialisation have been co-opted for political purposes, especially to justify foreign military interventions (Simpson, 2006), but also in peace movements (for example, see www.notinourname.net). The emotions of individual survivors and the relatives of victims have been prominently represented, though rarely alter state actions which are framed on their behalf:

Even after this happened and they started talking about retaliation, I'm more of a pacifist than ever. I'm a Republican – but what I saw that day, the devastation, I could not see us doing to other people.

James E. Dobson, paramedic, interviewed in Clark et al. (2011: 10-11)

Notwithstanding these contestations, my argument is that collective recognition of the trauma of global terrorist violence plays a role in the recovery of survivors, however those concerned are positioned in relation to dominant discourses about the events. Global terrorist events undoubtedly have a collective presence, to the point of being fetishised. But what of everyday terrorism? Imagining, for a moment, similar public responses to the trauma and loss suffered through everyday terrorism makes for a stark comparison. Here, rather than fears taking shape through spatial fetishism, the threat of everyday terrorism is barely represented in space, but covered up, hidden, invisible. Rather than collective grief that takes diverse forms, individual pain is often gagged by collective silence. There are no public memorials marking the significance of the trauma of victims, survivors, their children and other loved ones.

VII Counter-terrorism: where are the wars on terror?

As Phillips (2008) has articulated in the context of Australian political responses to the war on/of terror, there have also been stark differences in political responses to global and everyday terrorism in the west over the last decade, and these responses are directly related through the politics of fear. Counter-terrorism, constituting efforts by the state to prevent and respond to terrorist violence and threats, now overshadows global terrorism itself. Foreign and domestic policy responses, frequently described as driven or justified by fear, have asserted the political authority of western states and privileged interests within them (Closs Stephens and Vaughan-Williams, 2009; Cowan and Gilbert, 2008; Gregory and Pred, 2007; Robin, 2004). The 'new machismo' of the post-2001 war on/of terror is drowning out previous progress on a more egalitarian notion of human security (Hudson, 2005). Some see that, ironically, aggressive securitization as a tactic gives global terrorists exactly what they seek. For Goodwin (2006: 165), the US and Australia have in this way 'traded shamelessly upon people's fear of terrorism to win re-election'. As the flaws in western discourses and actions during the war on/of terror have become evident, so language and policies have shifted. The onus of responsibility for counter-(global)terrorism in the UK is now more dispersed, with an apparently benign but still racialised focus on working with the domestic communities deemed to be a threat, and public watchfulness becoming embedded in the everyday (Amoore, 2007, 2009; Briggs et al., 2006).

Where is the war on everyday terror? Understanding domestic violence as terrorism demands altered responses (Hammer, 2002). There have been significant shifts in the last four decades as the state has taken on responsibility (Walklate, 2008; Wilson, 1983). Many western countries have seen a similar pattern of everyday terrorism being raised and addressed by activists in the women's movement during the 1970s and 1980s, followed by the development of policing and criminal justice measures and state-funded services for victims and survivors (Dobash and Dobash 1992). This shift can also be seen as a response to public fears, as victims of crime were repositioned as consumers. While these interventions have been symbolically important, and answered some longstanding feminist demands (see Wilson, 1983), state-led interventions have taken control away from social movements, community services and victims' wishes (Phillips, 2008; Stanko, 2006; Walklate 2008). There are questions over the effectiveness of criminal justice approaches, as attrition rates remain high and there are no signs of wider behavioural change (Walklate, 2008). The professionalization of anti-violence services has meant increased vulnerability to other forms of violence for women of colour (INCITE! 2006). In addition, there are sharp geographical disparities in public and voluntary sector service provision and access (Brunell 2006; Coy et al 2011), and victims and survivors still counter the everyday terror they experience largely alone, or with informal support from families and friends.

Again, everyday securities are not only overshadowed by the attention that global crises receive, they are intimately connected to and shaped by them. This is the case, firstly, through the resourcing of the war on/of terror and other global security conflicts at the expense of safety from violence in the home (Phillips, 2008). Secondly and simultaneously, western-sponsored conflict in other states such as Palestine, Iraq and Afghanistan increases local rates of sexual and racist violence dramatically (Naber 2006). Thirdly, recent cuts to services for victims and survivors of everyday terrorism have been justified by global recession. Rollbacks on women's safety are not only the product of financial leanness, but also a changing climate on gender politics or 'war on women' in the US, where conservative politicians are targeting domestic violence legislation amid wider assaults on women's reproductive and physical security (Doll, 2012; see also Phillips, 2008, on the Australian experience). The UK has recently seen cuts of 31% to refuges and vital services tackling domestic violence, and on a typical day 230 women seeking emergency refuge space are turned away (Baird, 2012). Concerns about the capacity of organisations to continue to offer crucial, sometimes life-saving, services are widespread within the sector (Scottish Women's Aid, 2011; Women's Aid, 2012), but the government has not acknowledged these sharply gendered impacts of austerity on security (Baird, 2012). As Fine (2012: 3) writes, in the US context, 'the aggressive twinning of recession and slashing of the public programs has unleashed a muscular policy assault on women...the effects can be viewed globally, and also...locally'. Meanwhile, UK government spending of £3.5bn counter-terrorism and intelligence in 2010-11 was an increase on the previous year. There is a long way to go before everyday terrorism is recognised as widespread, terroristic, deeply damaging to societies and deserving of the highest level of public attention. The same is true of empathetic responses to victims and survivors in the west and elsewhere that are determined by their own needs and wishes.

VIII Conclusion: making connections, filling absences

The starting point of this paper was the inequitable imbalance in attention and resources that two forms of terrorism receive from wider society, the state, and researchers including geographers. It has explored the connections between everyday and global terrorism, identifying their shared basis as attempts to exert fear and control for political influence. Conceptualising the relation between these terrorisms within Pain and Smith's (2008) double helix, I have explored their similarities, discontinuities and direct connections, arguing that the politics of fear are entwined both across scales and across terrorisms.

Global terrorism does not always live up to its intent of instilling fear, and its achievement of political influence is very mixed. On the other hand, everyday terrorism, if assessed by the criteria widely used to define global terrorism, is very effective: it frequently invokes fear, it terrorises victims and those around them, it exerts psychological control in a way that the terrorist intends, and it leads to securitization in the form of changes to victims' behaviour that are not necessarily successful in challenging violence. Most of all, its effects reflect the wider political configurations within which it is produced.

Recasting domestic violence as terrorism has implications for addressing both terrorisms, and for future research. As feminists have argued, the possibility of sustainable peace is enhanced by the recalibration of understanding violence across scales and sites as closely interrelated (Moser 2001). Both terrorisms are constructed and have impacts in ways that are heavily mediated by relations of gender, race, class privilege and nationality. Policies to address either form of violence must therefore acknowledge these structural root causes, and prioritise the provision of culturally competent services for victims and survivors (INCITE! 2006; Sokoloff and Dupont 2005). In future geographical research, there is ample scope for culturally specific, intersectional and place-based accounts of different terrorisms that build on the remapping here. More research is also needed on the connections between international and intimate violence: their relation in times and places of war and peace, their experience in different contexts, and further analysis of political discourse to exposes the false separation of the two. This would usefully take forward recent feminist work that is asking not only how geopolitics shape the home and intimate, but how these spheres shape geopolitics (Brickell 2012a; Jones 2013; Pratt and Rosner 2006; Pratt 2012).

The separate literatures on how emotions are formed, experienced and used in global and everyday terrorisms are of mutual interest. Analyses of the invocation and use of emotions as a political strategy reminds us that fear and its emotional complex are not by-products of conflict, but central to its workings. The increasingly nuanced analysis of the emotional dynamics of everyday terrorism, what it achieves, and how state interventions can change, ease or reinforce it, might be taken up in analysis of global terrorism. In the latter this is a substantial gap in understanding, and building theory empirically from the experiences of those involved would lead to much richer and more insightful accounts. How, across private and public, do people actually experience, make sense of and resist terrorist incidents and threats? How do responses and securitization at one site relate to domestic or public security elsewhere? What is the role of emotions in survival and recovery, and how are they deployed in memorialisation and counter-terrorism? And how, in the end, do emotions and behaviours that appear personal or political arise from the same social and political forms?

Emotions that cross scales and sites are also present in the political project of working against violence and fostering inclusive securities (see Pratt 2012). Sylvester's (1994) 'empathetic cooperation' is commonly invoked as an alternative to mainstream state responses to global conflict and terrorism, and suggested as an emotional basis for ethical global responses to conflict (Sjoberg, 2009). For example, Burke (2009) suggests the need for a new human right, freedom from fear, which would only be possible through a different kind of response to terrorism; here 'empathetic cooperation' might mean bridging difference through emotional identification, and concern for others' security rather than just one's own. Achieving this, as Eschle and Maignaschca (2009) suggest, is best tackled as a united political project between researchers and activists, to if mainstream perspectives and the marginalisation of feminist work are to be challenged.

As scholars we have had a role in the fetishising and distancing of different forms of violence that comes with separating out terrorisms along a scaled system with its implied judgments of magnitude and importance. This itself is a spatial practice built on certain imaginaries, ironically clearest in the pattern of geographical work on violence (though also reflected in other disciplines - see McKie 2006; Walby 2013). Remapping and relating terrorisms contributes to wider collective recognition of, and responsibility for, everyday terrorism – it is, after all, far more common than global terrorism, and much more damaging to human life. Domestic violence is a strange absence in human geography. It's time to bring terrorism home.

Acknowledgements

My thanks to three anonymous referees for their very constructive feedback. This research has been enriched by working with Jo Ozga and Cheryl Stewart of Scottish Womens Aid, and through conversations with Kye Askins, Lucy Berrington, Caitlin Cahill, Sara Kindon and Lynn Staeheli.

Notes

¹ 'Jennifer' is a white British woman who was the first to be interviewed in a research project on everyday terrorism (Pain and Scottish Womens Aid 2012; Pain 2013). I am very grateful to Peter Hopkins for his help with this interview.

² Male victims of domestic violence have received greater attention in recent years, leading to debates over 'gender symmetry' (Dobash and Dobash, 2004; DeKeseredy and Dragiewicz, 2007; Dutton, 2006). I write from the standpoint that domestic violence is a serious matter whoever it targets, and that gender is always a relevant framing (Stanko, 2006). Overall, women's violence against men tends to be less frequent, less severe and have fewer serious consequences (Dobash and Dobash, 2004; Hester, 2009), but this is not always the case, and men may have particular difficulties seeking help informally and formally. Where I refer to female victims or survivors, this is because the evidence being discussed is specific to women's experience. Evidence about abuse in same-sex relationships suggests similar rates of victimisation as for heterosexual women, and sexual orientation creates a range of additional issues concerning the nature of abuse and the process of seeking help (LGBT Domestic Abuse 2012; Donovan et al, 2006; Whiting, 2007).

³In this review, 'victim' is used to describe someone in an abusive relationship, and 'survivor' as someone who is in the process of leaving or who has left. The distinction is not clearcut. Survival is a long process, leaving is rarely a single event in time, and while 'victim' can imply passivity and weakness, the reality is that living with abuse takes strength and resilience. But the distinction can be strategically useful in identifying those who are abused alongside victims of other crimes, and recognition of victimisation is an important stage in the process of becoming a survivor (Scottish Women's Aid, 2012).

References

- Abrahams, H. (2010) Rebuilding lives after domestic violence. Jessica Kingsley, London.
- Adelman M (2003) The military, militarism, and the militarization of domestic violence. Violence Against Women 9(9): 1118-1152.
- Amoore, L. (2007) Vigilant visualities: the watchful politics of the war on terror. Security Dialogue, 38, 2, 139-56.
- Amoore L (2009) Response before the event: On forgetting the war on terror. In: Closs Stephens AC and Vaughan-Williams N (eds) Terrorism and the Politics of Response. Oxon: Routledge, pp.130-143.
- Anderson KL (2008) Is partner violence worse in the context of control? Journal of Marriage and Family 70: 1157-1168.
- Australian Women's Intra Network (2006) What has the government done for women's security? www.isis.aust.com/win/
- Baird, V. (2012) Everywoman safe everywhere: Labour's Commission on Women's Safety. The Labour Party, London.
- Barrett BJ and St Pierre M (2011) Variations in women's help seeking in response to intimate partner violence: Findings from a Canadian population-based study. Violence Against Women 17(1): 47-70.
- Berrington L (2013) Obama gun measures are for wives, ex-lovers, too. WomensENews Thursday February 14 2013 <http://womensenews.org/story/domestic-violence/130213/obama-gun-measures-are-wives-ex-lovers-too>
- Bhattacharyya G (2008) Dangerous brown men: exploiting sex, violence and feminism in the war on terror London: Zed Books.
- Bondi, L. (2013) Research and therapy: generating meaning and feeling gaps. Qualitative Inquiry, 19, 1, 9-19.

- Bowstead J (2011) Space and place as constraints and resources in women's strategies to escape domestic violence. Metronome 1: 9-17.
- Brickell K (2008) 'Fire in the house': Gendered experiences of drunkenness and violence in Siem Reap, Cambodia. Geoforum 39: 1667-1675.
- Brickell K (2012a) Geopolitics of home. Geography Compass 6, 10, 575-88
- Brickell K (2012b) 'Mapping' and 'doing' critical geographies of home. Progress in Human Geography 36, 2: 225-44.
- Briggs R, Fieschi C and Lownbrough H (2006) Bringing it Home: Community-Based Approaches to Counter-Terrorism. Report, Demos, United Kingdom, December.
- Brown K (2011) Rights and victims, martyrs and memories: The European Court of Human Rights and political transition in Northern Ireland. In: Buyse A and Hamilton M (eds) Transitional Jurisprudence and the ECHR: Justice, Politics and Rights. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp.52-80.
- Brownmiller, S. (1975) Against our will: men, women and rape, Martin, Secker and Warburg, London.
- Brunell L (2005) Marginality and the new geography of domestic violence policy in post-communist Poland. Gender, Place and Culture 12(3): 293-316.
- Burke A (2009) Metaterror. International Relations 23(1): 61-67.
- Clark, M. M., Bearman, P., Ellis, C. and Smith, S. D. (2011) After the fall: New Yorkers remember September, 2001 and the years that followed. The New Press, New York.
- Clark S and Hamby S (2011) Challenges and resources of survivors of domestic violence. Available at: <http://scholar.simmons.edu/handle/10090/21561?show=full> (accessed 21 April 2012).
- Closs Stephens, A. (2007) 'Seven million Londoners, one London': national and urban ideas of community in the aftermath of the 7 July, 2005 bombings in London. Alternatives, 32, 155-76.

Closs Stephens A and Vaughan-Williams N (2009) Terrorism and the Politics of Response. Oxon: Routledge.

Coady C A J (1985) The morality of terrorism. Philosophy , 60, 231, 47-69.

Cowen, D. and Gilbert, E. (2008) Fear and the familial in the US War on Terror. In Pain, R. and Smith, S., editors Fear: critical geopolitics and everyday life, Ashgate, Aldershot.

Coy M, Kelly L, Foord J and Bowstead J (2011) Roads to nowhere? Mapping violence against women services. Violence Against Women 17(3): 404-425.

Crenshaw K (1999) Mapping the margins: intersectionality, identity politics, and violence against women of colour Stanford Law Review 43, 6, 1241-99.

Datta, A. (2012) The illegal city: space, law and gender in a Delhi squatter settlement. Ashgate, Aldershot.

DeKeseredy WS and Dragiewicz M (2007) Understanding the complexities of feminist perspectives on woman abuse: A commentary on Donald G. Dutton's rethinking domestic violence. Violence Against Women 13(8): 874-884.

Di Bartolo L (2001) The geography of reported domestic violence in Brisbane: A social justice perspective. Australian Geographer 32(3): 321-341.

Dobash RE and Dobash R (1979) Violence Against Wives: A Case Against the Patriarchy. New York: Free Press.

Dobash RE and Dobash R (1992) Women, Violence and Social Change Routledge, London

Dobash RP and Dobash RE (2004) Women's violence to men in intimate relationships: working on a puzzle. British Journal of Criminology 44, 3, 324-349.

Doll, J. (2012) When violence against women becomes a political game. The Atlantic Wire, 13 March, 2012, www.theatlanticwire.com/national/2012/03/when-violence-against-women-becomes-political-game/49937/

Donovan C, Hester M, Holmes J and McCarry M (2006) Comparing domestic violence in same sex and heterosexual relationships. Available at http://www.broken-rainbow.org.uk/cohsar_report.pdf (accessed 1st May 2012)

Dowler, L. (2012) Gender, militarization and sovereignty. Geography Compass, 6, 8, 490-99

Dowler, L. and Sharp, J. (2001) A feminist geopolitics? Space and Polity, 5, 3, 165-76.

Duncan, N. (1996) Renegotiating gender and sexuality in public and private spaces. In Duncan, N. G., editor, Destabilizing geographies of gender and sexuality. Routledge, London.

Dutton DG (2006) Rethinking domestic violence. University of British Columbia Press.

Edkins J (2003) The rush to memory and the rhetoric of war. Journal of Political and Military Sociology 31(2): 231-251.

Edkins J (2004) Ground zero: Reflections on trauma and in/distinction and response. Journal for Cultural Research 8(3): 247-270.

Edkins, J. (2007) Missing persons: Manhattan, September 2001. In: Dauphine, E. and Masters, C. (eds.) The logics of biopower and the war on terror: living, dying, surviving. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 25-42

Edkins, J. (2008) Biopolitics, communication and global governance. Review of International Studies 34, 211-32.

Eisenstein, Z. (2007) Sexual decoys: gender, race and war in imperial democracy. Zed Books, London.

Elden S (2007) Terror and Territory. Antipode 39(5): 821-845.

Eschle C and Maignashca B (2009) Feminist scholarship, bridge-building and political affinity. International Relations 23(1): 127-134.

Fine M, Weis L, Proweller A, Bertram C and Mariza J (1998) The Unknown City: The Lives of Poor and Working-class Young Adults. Boston: Beacon Press.

- Fine M (2012) Troubling calls for evidence: A critical race, class and gender analysis of whose evidence counts? Feminism and Psychology 22(1): 3-19.
- Flint C (2003) Terrorism and Counterterrorism: Geographic research questions and agendas. The Professional Geographer 55(2): 161-169.
- Flint C and Radil SM (2009) Terrorism and counter-terrorism: Situating al-Qaeda and the global war on terror within geopolitical trends and structures. Eurasian Geography and Economics 50(2): 150-171.
- Franks J (2006) Rethinking the Roots of Terrorism. Palgrave Macmillan.
- Fromkin D (1975) The strategy of terrorism. Foreign Affairs 53: 692-693.
- Goodwin RE (2006) What's Wrong with Terrorism? Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Graham, S. (2010) Cities under siege: the new military urbanism. Verso Books, London.
- Gregory D (2004) The Colonial Present: Afghanistan, Palestine, Iraq. Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.
- Gregory, D. and Pred, A. (2007) Violent geographies: fear, terror and political violence. Routledge, London.
- Gupta, D. K. (2008) Understanding terrorism and political violence: the life cycle of birth, growth, transformation, and demise. Ashgate, Aldershot.
- Hammer R (2002) Antifeminism and Family Terrorism: A Critical Feminist Perspective. Lanham: Rowan & Littlefield Publishers, Inc.
- Hammer R (2003) Militarism and family terrorism: a critical feminist perspective. Review of Education, Pedagogy, and Cultural Studies 25, 3, 231-56
- Hanmer, J. (1978) Male violence and the social control of women. In Littlejohn, G., editor, Power and the state. Croom Helm, London, 217-38.
- Hannah M (2006) Torture and the Ticking Bomb: The war on terrorism as a geographical imagination of power/knowledge. Annals of the Association of American Geographers 96(3): 622-640.

Harne, L. And Radford, J., (2008) Tackling domestic violence: theories, policies and practice. Open University Press, Milton Keynes.

Hearn J (1996) Men's violence to known women: Historical, everyday and theoretical constructions by men. In: Fawcett B, Featherstone B, Hearn J and Toft C (eds) Violence and Gender Relations: Theories and Interventions. London: Sage Publications, pp.22-37.

Herman, J. L. (1992) Complex PTSD: a syndrome in survivors of prolonged and repeated trauma. Journal of Traumatic Stress, 5, 377-39.

Herman, J. (1997) Trauma and recovery: the aftermath of violence from domestic abuse to political terror. Basic Books, New York Herring E (2008) Critical terrorism studies: An activist scholar perspective. Critical Studies on Terrorism 1(2): 197-211.

Hester M (2009) Who Does What to Whom? Gender and Domestic Violence Perpetrators. Report, University of Bristol in association with the Northern Rock Foundation, United Kingdom, June.

Hester, M., Pearson, C., Harwin, N. and Abrahams, H. (2006) Making an Impact: Children and Domestic Violence - A Reader. Jessica Kingsley, London hooks b (2000) Feminism is for Everybody: Passionate Politics. Cambridge: South End Press.

Hoogensen G and Rottem SV (2004) Gender identity and the subject of security. Security Dialogue 35(2): 155-171.

Hudson H (2005) 'Doing' security as though humans matter: A feminist perspective on gender and the politics of human security. Security Dialogue 36(2): 155-174.

Humphreys C and Joseph S (2004) Domestic violence and the politics of trauma. Women's Studies International Forum 27: 559-570.

Humphreys C and Thiara R (2002) Routes to safety: protection issues facing abused women and children and the role of outreach services. Women's Aid, London

- Hunt, K. and Rygiel, K. (2006) Engendering the war on terror: war stories and camouflaged politics. Ashgate: Aldershot.
- Jackson R (2007) Introduction: The case for critical terrorism studies. European Political Science 6: 225-227.
- Hyndman, J. (2001) Towards a feminist geopolitics. Canadian Geographer 45, 2, 210-22.
- Hyndman, J. (2003) Beyond either/or: a feminist analysis of September 11th. ACME. 2, 1, 1-13.
- Hyndman, J. (2007) The securitization of fear in post-Tsunami Sri Lanka. Annals of the Association of American Geographers 97, 1, 361-72.
- INCITE! (2006) Color of violence: the INCITE! anthology Cambridge MA: South End Press.
- Johnson MP (1995) Patriarchal terrorism and common couple violence: Two forms of violence against women. Journal of Marriage and Family 57(2): 283-294.
- Johnson MP (2008) A Typology of Domestic Violence: Intimate Terrorism, Violent Resistances, and Situational Couple Violence. Boston: University Press of New England.
- Johnson P (2008) 'Violence all around us' Dilemmas of global and local agendas addressing violence against Palestinian women, an initial intervention. Cultural Dynamics 20(2): 119-131.
- Jones A (1994) Next Time She'll Be Dead: Battering and How to Stop It. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Jones A (2013) Domestic and international violence are one and the same. Salon 21 March 2013. Available at http://www.salon.com/2013/03/21/domestic_and_international_violence_are_one_and_the_same_partner/ (accessed 19 April 2013)
- Jones M (2004) 'A fight about nothing': constructions of domestic violence. PhD Thesis, University of Adelaide
- Katz, C. (1996) Towards minor theory. Environment and Planning D 14, 487-99.

Katz, C. (2004) Growing up global: economic restructuring and children's everyday lives, University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis.

Katz, C. (2007) Banal terrorism: spatial fetishism and everyday insecurity. In Gregory, D. and Pred, A., editors, Violent geographies: fear, terror and political violence, Routledge, London, 347-61.

Koskela, H. (1997) 'Bold walk and breakings': women's spatial confidence versus fear of violence. Gender, Place and Culture, 4:3, 301-319.

LGBT Domestic Abuse (2012) Domestic abuse info. Available at:

<http://www.lgbtdomesticabuse.org.uk/service-providers/domestic-abuse-info.htm>

(accessed 19 April 2013).

London Assembly (2006) Report of the 7 July Review Committee. Greater London Authority, London.

Lutz JM (2010) A critical view of critical terrorism studies. Perspectives on Terrorism 4(6): 31-40.

McDowell S (2012) Symbolic warfare in the ethnocratic state: Conceptualising memorialisation and territoriality in Sri Lanka. Terrorism and Political Violence 24(1): 22-37.

Mama, A. (1996) The hidden struggle: statutory and voluntary sector responses to violence against Black women in the home. Whiting and Birch, London

McCue, M. L. (2008) Domestic violence. ABC-CLIO, Oxford.

McKie L (2006) Sociological work on violence: gender, theory and research. Sociological Research Online 11, 2

Menjívar C and Salcido O (2002) Immigrant women and domestic violence: common experiences in different countries. Gender and Society 16, 6, 989-920

Meth P (2003) Rethinking the 'domus' in domestic violence: Homelessness, space and domestic violence in South Africa. Geoforum 34: 317-327.

Moisi, D. (2009) The geopolitics of emotion: how cultures of fear, humiliation and hope are reshaping the world. Bodley Head, London.

Montalvo-Liendo N (2009) Cross-cultural factors in disclosure of intimate partner violence: An integrated review. Journal of Advanced Nursing 65(1): 20-34.

Moser C O N (2001) The gendered continuum of violence and conflict: an operational framework. In Moser C O N and Clark F C (eds) Victims, perpetrators or actors? Gender, armed conflict and political violence London: Zed Books

Naber N (2006) A call for consistency: Palestinian resistance and radical US women of color. In INCITE! (eds) Color of violence: the INCITE! anthology Cambridge MA: South End Press, 75-8.

Nayak DK (2005) Changing Indian family and the patterns in domestic violence: A geographical perspective with special reference to the tribal areas. XXV International population conference, Tours, France, 18-23 July 2005.

Onuf N (2009) Making terror/ism. International Relations 23(1): 53-60.

Pain, R. (2009) Globalized fear: towards an emotional geopolitics. Progress in Human Geography 33, 4, 466-86.

Pain, R. (2010) The new geopolitics of fear. Geography Compass 4, 3, 226-40.

Pain, R. (2013) A seismology of emotion: fear and activism during domestic violence. Available from the author, Durham University.

Pain, R. and Scottish Womens Aid (2012) Everyday terrorism: how fear works in domestic abuse Durham University <http://www.dur.ac.uk/resources/beacon/EverydayTerrorism.pdf>

Pain, R. and Smith, S. J. (2008) Fear: critical geopolitics and everyday life, Ashgate, Aldershot.

Pain, R., Panelli, R., Little, J. and Kindon, S. (2010) Moments in everyday/distant geopolitics: Young people's fears and hopes. Geoforum 41, 6, 972-82.

- Panelli R, Kraack A and Little J (2005) Claiming space and community: Rural women's strategies for living with, and beyond, fear. Geoforum 36: 495-508.
- Pateman C (1988) The sexual contract. Stanford University Press
- Phillips R (2008) Feminism, policy and women's safety during Australia's 'war on terror'. Feminist Review 89: 55-72.
- Pratt, C. (2012) Families apart: migrant mothers and the conflicts of labour and love University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis
- Pratt, G. and Rosner, V. (2006) Introduction: the global and the intimate. Women's Studies Quarterly, 34, 1-2, 13-24.
- Pruitt LR (2008) Place matters: Domestic violence and rural difference. Wisconsin Journal of Law, Gender and Society 23(2): 347-416.
- Puar, J.K. (2007) Terrorist assemblages: homonationalism in queer times. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Rapin AJ (2009) Does terrorism create terror? Critical Studies on Terrorism 2(2): 165-179.
- Rapoport DC (2004) The four waves of modern terrorism. In: Cronin A and Ludes J (eds) Attacking Terrorism: Elements of a Grand Strategy. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, pp.46-73.
- Richardson L (2006) What Terrorists Want: Understanding the Terrorist Threat. London: John Murray.
- Robin, C. (2004) Fear: the history of a political idea, Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Robins, C. E. (2003) New York Voices: the trauma of 9/11. Psychosocial Press, Madison WI.
- Rose, G. (1993) Feminism and geography: the limits of geographical knowledge University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis
- Rumford C (2009) Finding meaning in meaningless times: Emotional responses to terror threats in London. In: Closs Stephens A and Vaughan-Williams N (eds) Terrorism and the Politics of Response. Oxon: Routledge, pp.164-177.

Sandberg, L., and Rönnblom, M. (2013) Afraid and restricted vs. bold and equal: women's fear of violence and gender equality discourses in Sweden. European Journal of Women's Studies 20, 2, 189-203

Scottish Executive (2003) Preventing Domestic Abuse: A National Strategy. Report, Scottish Executive, Scotland.

Scottish Women's Aid (2010) Children and young people's exposure to domestic abuse, Information briefing no.4. Scottish Women's Aid, Scotland.

Scottish Women's Aid (2011) Funding for Women's Aid Services in Scotland: Scottish Women's Aid Funding Survey 2011. Scottish Women's Aid, Scotland.

Scottish Women's Aid (2012) Men Affected By Domestic Abuse. Scottish Women's Aid, Edinburgh

Sela- Shayovitz R (2010) External and internal terror: The effects of terrorist acts and economic changes on intimate femicide rates in Israel. Feminist Criminology 5(2): 135-155.

Simpson D (2006) 9/11: The Culture of Commemoration. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Sharp, J. (2007) Geography and gender: finding feminist political geographies. Progress in Human Geography, 31, 3, 381-88.

Sharp, J., Routledge, P., Philo, C. and Paddison, R. (2000) Entanglements of power: geographies of domination/resistance, Routledge, London

Sjoberg L (2009) Feminist interrogations of terrorism/terrorism studies. International Relations 23(1): 69-74.

Smelser N (2004) September 11, 2001 as a cultural trauma. In: Alexander J, Eyerman R, Giesen B, Smelser N and Sztompka P (eds) Cultural Trauma and Collective Identity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, pp.264-282.

Sokoloff NJ and Dupont I (2005) Domestic violence at the intersections of race, class, and gender: Challenges and contributions to understanding violence against marginalized women in diverse communities. Violence Against Women 11(1): 38-64.

- Staehele, L. A., Kofman, E. and Peake, L. (2004) Making women, mapping politics: feminist perspectives on political geography, Routledge, London.
- Staehele, L. and Nagel, C. R. (2008) Rethinking security: perspectives from Arab-American and British Arab activists. Antipode 40, 5, 780-801.
- Stanko EA (2006) Theorizing about violence: Observations from the Economic and Social Research Council's violence research program. Violence Against Women 12(6): 543-555.
- Stark E (2007) Coercive control: how men entrap women in personal life. Oxford University Press, Oxford
- Swan S C, Gambone L J, Caldwell JE, Sullivan TP, Snow DL (2008) A review of research on women's use of violence with male intimate partners. Violence Vict. 23, 3, 301–314.
- Sylvester C (1994) Empathetic cooperation: A feminist method for IR. Millennium - Journal of International Studies 23(2): 315-334.
- Tamas, S. (2009) Writing and righting trauma: troubling the autoethnographic voice. Forum: Qualitative Social Research 10, 1, 22.
- Tamas, S. (2011) Life after leaving: the remains of spousal abuse. Left Coast Press, Walnut Creek CA.
- Thien D and Del Casino V J (2012) (Un)healthy men, masculinities and the geographies of health. Annals of the Association of American Geographers 102, 5, 1146-1156
- Tilly C (2004) Terror, terrorism, terrorists. Sociological Theory 22(1): 5-13.
- Tulloch, J. (2006) One day in July: experiencing 7/7. Little Brown, London.
- Walby S (2013) Violence and society: introduction to an emerging field of sociology. Current Sociology 61, 2, 95-111
- Walklate S (2008) What is to be done about violence against women? Gender, violence, cosmopolitanism and the law. British Journal of Criminology 48: 39-54.
- Warrington M (2001) 'I must get out': The geographies of domestic violence. Transactions of the Institute of British Geographers 26: 365-382.

Wendt S and Cheers B (2004) Rural cultures, domestic violence, and stories from a rural region. Women Against Violence: An Australian Feminist Journal 15: 4-11.

Whiting N (2007) A contradiction in terms? A gendered analysis of same sex domestic abuse. Scottish Womens Aid, Edinburgh

Wilson E (1983) What is to be done about violence against women? Penguin, London Women's Aid (2012) Largest global data count reveals England's own worrying position in refuge provision. Press Release, 8th March, 2012, Women's Aid, London.

Young I M (2003) Feminist reactions to the contemporary security regime. Hypatia 18(1): 223-231.