ABSTRACT

For this normative survey of graduate students, questionnaires were sent to 51,429 students at 158 sample institutions that have graduate programs in academic and technical areas that lead primarily to master's and doctoral degrees. Sixty-six percent or 33,511 returned usable forms. For this survey 3 types of weights were developed: (1) a between-college weight, (2) a within-college weight, and (3) a subject weight. The established ACE survey design was used that: (1) defines and stratifies the population of institutions; (2) samples institutions within these institutions. The tables present information on: (1) demographic and background characteristics, (2) academic progress in terms of degrees and institutions, (3) academic progress and experience, (4) career progress and involvement, (5) attitudes toward higher education and their preferences, and (6) general and political attitudes and preferences, all by sex and highest degree expected. Other tables present data on percentage distribution among academic disciplines by sex, and on (1) demographic and background characteristics; (2) academic progress in terms of degrees and institutions, and in terms of experience; (3) career progress and involvement; (4) attitudes toward higher education and their academic experience; and (5) general and political attitudes and preferences, all by field of study. AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION
LOGAN WILSON, PRESIDENT

The American Council on Education, founded in 1918, is a council of educational organizations and institutions. Its purpose is to advance education and educational methods through comprehensive voluntary and cooperative action on the part of American educational associations, organizations, and institutions.

The Council's Office of Research was established in 1965 to assume responsibility for conducting research on questions of general concern to higher education. ACE Research Reports are designed to expedite communication of the Office's research findings to a limited number of educational researchers and other interested persons.

ACE RESEARCH REPORTS

Vol. 6, No. 5

October, 1971

Foreword

This report, published by the American Council on Education in connection with its continuing Cooperative Institutional Research Program, resulted from a special research project done in cooperation with the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education. The total cooperative project, which included surveys of faculty, graduate students, and undergraduates in American colleges and universities, was initiated, designed, and carried out through the joint efforts of the two organizations; it was supported by the Carnegie Commission and by the U. S. Office of Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Any opinions expressed in this report do not necessarily reflect the position or policy of the funding agencies or of affiliated organizations, and no official endorsement by these organizations or agencies should be inferred.

Support for the analysis of data and preparation of this report came from grants to the American Council on Education from the National Science Foundation (GR-100) and the National Institute of Mental Health (Grant 1 R12 MH17). Alexander W. Astin and Alan E. Bayer played key roles in the liaison with the Carnegie Commission and were helpful in the subsequent analysis of data and in the preparation of this report. Charles L. Sell provided extensive programming assistance in developing the weights and statistical tabulations. Joan G. Creager devoted many tedious hours of her professional time to aiding the author in preparing the tables from the computer printouts provided through the Office of Research data--accessing system. Preparation of the manuscript, including the formidable chore of typing and checking the numerous tables, was carried out by Margo King. Jeannie Royer was responsible for making arrangements for the final printing. Laura Kent made many useful editorial suggestions on the draft.

Although it is not feasible to mention by name the many other persons at the Council or associated with the Carnegie Commission, including those at the University of California at Berkeley, who have had some hand in this project from questionnaire preparation, sampling, and administration through the writing of the final report, their contributions are gratefully acknowledged.

Finally, we express our appreciation to the graduate students, representatives, and presidents of the cooperating institutions, without whose support and interest this project would not have been possible.

The American Graduate Student: A Normative Description

In 1969, the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education conducted a set of extensive surveys of students, faculty, and nonteaching staff in the nation's colleges and universities. The American Council on Education agreed to cooperate in these surveys, which were implemented by the Survey Research Center at the University of California at Berkeley. Through its Cooperative Institutional Research Program (CIRP), which began in the fall of 1966, the Council has collected information from the freshmen entering a nationwide sample of institutions of higher education. Thus, by cooperating with the Carnegie Commission, the Council had the opportunity to supplement its data on undergraduates and on the college environment. At the same time, the Carnegie Commission was able to take advantage of the Council's established institutional sample and the related logistical arrangements at the participating institutions and to utilize data already collected by the Council.

The extensive questionnaires used in these surveys were designed to elicit a wide variety of information for research and to provide national normative data representative of the heterogeneous populations of institutions and of persons in higher education. This report deals with the graduate students: their backgrounds, their current status and experiences, and their expectations for the future. In many respects, it parallels a previous ACE report describing college faculty (Bayer, 1970).

Several general studies of graduate education have appeared in recent years (e.g., Berelson, 1960; Walters, 1965; Arit, 1968; and Mayhew, 1970) and the general aspects of graduate education have been studied against the general background of concern about the nation's human resources (Folger, Astin, and Bayer, 1970). Moreover, particular aspects of graduate education have been the focus of a number of special studies in three major areas of interest. In the first area, the abilities and prior achievements of graduate students as measured by the Graduate Record Examinations have been the subject of many studies, both published and unpublished (Lannholm, 1968). There was also an extensive series of studies constituting a program of research on the evaluation and selection of National Science Foundation graduate fellows (Harmon, 1966). A second area--that of graduate enrollments, trends, and doctorate production and utilization--is covered in the annual reports of enrollments and earned degrees conferred, published by the U. S. Office of Education, and in the frequent reports of doctorate production and projected trends, published by the National Research Council; this latter series includes some reports on the baccalaureate origins of science doctorates and on postdoctorate career patterns. A special study of women doctorates contributes a deeper insight into an important aspect of the nation's human resources (Astin, 1970). Recently, Carter (1971) has given explicit attention to the relation between doctorate production and broader economic and demographic trends. Finally, in the third major area, graduate programs, faculties, and departments have been evaluated with respect to their reputations in the academic community (Carter, 1966; Roose and Andersen, 1970).

If the development of the graduate student as a human resource is regarded as the primary purpose of graduate education, it is remarkable that so little has been done to assess graduate students' experiences and developing expectations as the students themselves report them. Although Heiss, in her more general studies of graduate education (1970), included a questionnaire survey of doctoral candidates at nine diverse universities, the present survey is by far the most extensive one that uses the graduate student as respondent, regardless of his current status or level of degree aspiration. The scope of this undertaking is reflected in the comprehensive content of the 12-page questionnaire (a copy of which is shown in Appendix A of this report) and by the scope of the initial working sample of 158 participating institutions.

The Graduate Student Population and Its Sampling

The established ACE survey design--which was the one employed for the survey of graduate students--is to define and stratify the population of institutions, to sample institutions disproportionately within cells, and then to sample observation units within these institutions. The general principles and strategies of such survey sampling in higher education, and the weighting procedures used to adjust survey data files, have been discussed elsewhere (Creager, 1968). For reasons of logistics and cost, the several surveys conducted by the Carnegie Commission used samples of institutions that participated in the Council's Cooperative Institutional Research Program; in the case of the graduate student survey, however, only those institutions that had postbaccalaureate programs were included. Thus, the institutions surveyed consist of a subsample of the Council's stratified national sample and provide the base for within-institution sampling of graduate students.

The U. S. Office of Education (1969) was the source of data on the 1968 enrollments by sex in 1,075 institutions offering postbaccalaureate programs. Both degree candidates and noncandidates and both resident and extension students were included in the enrollment figures; persons doing postdoctoral work, taking short refresher courses, or pursuing other special programs were excluded. These data, in conjunction with the type and control characteristics of the institutions are required to define and stratify the population of institutions and to provide the basis for weighting the survey data. Because of the logistic and cost constraints on the survey sample, a subpopulation of 803 institutions was defined as the relevant universe for the present study. Thus, the graduate survey excluded institutions whose primary emphasis is on postbaccalaureate professional training for the clergy, the arts, medicine, and law. The relevant universe, then, consists of those institutions with graduate programs in academic and technical areas that lead primarily to master's and doctoral degrees (Ph.D., Ed.D., or equivalent) and that are located in the 50 states or the District of Columbia. It should be noted, however, that a few institutions in the sample, usually the universities, have some programs which are oriented toward the religious, artistic, medical, and legal professions. The 803 institutions were stratified in ten cells as shown in Table 1.

Each institutional representative for the ACE Cooperative Institutional Research Program provided a roster of the graduate students enrolled at his institution. All 158 sample institutions are listed in Appendix B. An approximately three-sixteenths random sample of graduate students selected from these rosters was mailed the questionnaire. Of the 51,429 questionnaires sent out, 33,511 usable forms were returned (66 percent) after two mail followups of nonrespondents and a phone followup of 1,000 residual nonrespondents. No usable questionnaire was obtained from students in four very small institutions. Another institution, an art school included in the original sample, was dropped from the normative sample because it was not a member of the population as defined. Thus, the data are based on the responses of 33,119 graduate students from 153 institutions.

Weighting Procedures

To obtain a normative description of the American graduate student population, the survey information was weighted so as to reasonably approximate population distribution parameters. Three types of weights were developed. The first, a between-college weight, adjusts the data for the disproportionate sampling of institutions relative to the target population as stratified into the ten cells shown in Table 1. This stratification takes into account institutional type and control as defined by the U. S. Office of Education in the Higher Education General Information Surveys. The weight for institutions in a given stratification cell was calculated as the ratio of students (both part-time and full-time) enrolled for advanced degrees in all population institutions in that cell to the corresponding enrollment count for the sample institutions in that cell. This procedure was carried out separately for each sex. The weights, ranging from 2.1 to 18.5, are shown in Table 1. Also shown in Table 1 are the number of institutions and the number of graduate students, by sex, in each cell for both the population and the sample.

The second type of weight, a within-college weight--computed separately not only for each sex but also for each participating institution-- is the ratio of the number of enrollees for advanced degrees to the number of survey respondents. Thus, it takes into account the original three--sixteenths sampling as well as variations between colleges in the total response rate. It does not control for such other possible sources of differential response rates as academic field, socioeconomic background, race, or ability.

The third type of weight, computed separately for each sex, is the subject weight, which was finally applied to the data files to produce the normative distributions tabulated in this report. The subject weight is the product of the first two weights that correspond to the respondents' institution and sex.

National Normative Estimates

The weighted national estimates of the percentage distributions of American graduate students on items from the survey questionnaire are presented in a series of tables. Table 2 shows the actual and the weighted numbers of graduate students in the normative groups, defined by highest degree expected and by field of graduate study. In Tables 3 to 8, the distributions of responses on various items are indicated for each sex, and for both sexes combined, in five categories and for all respondents combined. The five categories are based on combinations of the response categories to item 4-3 of the questionnaire--highest degree expected. Table 9 gives the percentage distributions, for each sex and for both sexes combined, of responses to the five subitems concerning academic disciplines listed in item 13 of the questionnaire. These subitems ask about the respondent's intended and actual undergraduate major fields, his department of graduate study, and his actual or intended fields of master's and doctoral degrees. Tables 10 to 15 show the percentage distributions of responses to other questionnaire items within nine categories of major field as indicated by responses to the graduate department subitem; in this second set of distribution tables, only figures for both sexes combined are given.

The percentages shown for each item are based on the total number of students who responded to that item, and who also responded to the item which defined the relevant tabulation category (sex, field, highest degree expected). Percentages have been rounded to the nearest 0.1 percent and will thus total to 100, within rounding error, although on those checklist items where the respondent was instructed to mark as many as apply, the percentages will generally total to more than 100 percent. In most cases, the response categories were tabulated in the same order as they appear on the questionnaire.

In the two major sets of tables (3 to 8 and 10 to 15), items have been arranged according to a useful, if somewhat arbitrary, classification as indicated by the table headings: demographic and background items in Tables 3 and 10; items about academic progress in terms of degrees received and institutions attended in Tables 4 and 11; other items on academic progress and experience in Tables 5 and 12; items on career and professional progress in Tables 6 and 13; items on attitudes toward higher education and academic experience in Tables 7 and 14; and other items on general and political attitudes or preferences in Tables 8 and 15.

Since, for reasons of space, many item designations had to be shortened, the reader is advised to check the survey questionnaire (Appendix A) for the complete wording, especially in the case of the attitude items. To facilitate cross-reference between tabulated item responses and the original survey items, each item in the tables is followed in parentheses by a reference to the appropriate questionnaire number, e.g., (26); where subitems were tabulated separately, a second number--e.g., (26-1)--is given if the subitems were horizontally arranged and a letter designation--e.g., (26-a)--is given if the subitems were vertically arranged in the questionnaire. The opposite cross-reference, from questionnaire item to location in the tables, may be found in Appendix C.

For special purposes, alternative classifications and cross-tabulations may prove more useful than marginal distributions. To meet such needs, qualified persons may use the data-accessing system developed by the Council's Office of Research (Bayer et al., 1969).
