THE NEIGHBORHOODS OF AUGUSTAN ROME

This volume investigates the neighborhoods of ancient Rome during the reign of the first Roman emperor, Caesar Augustus (27 B.C.E.–14 C.E.). Focusing on a group of neighborhood-based voluntary associations that were important political and social communities for the city's diverse population of slaves and ex-slaves, it locates the Augustan neighborhoods within the broader context of the history of Rome. John Bert Lott stresses their importance as physical and cultural divisions of the city and investigates the distinctive relationship between local neighborhoods and Augustus himself. An interdisciplinary study that makes use of archaeological, epigraphic, and topographic evidence, this book makes an important contribution to our knowledge of the urban life of Rome's lower classes and to our understanding of the imperial ideology that supported the development of the dynastic Roman monarchy.

John Bert Lott is assistant professor of classics at Vassar College.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book was initially conceived as a first “new project” after graduate school – an article or short series of articles at most. As such projects do, it became more.

It would be impossible, because of limitations of space and the reader’s attention, to acknowledge by name all the colleagues, scholars, and friends who have contributed to my study. I must mention Ann Kuttner and Bob Palmer, who have in different ways left marks on many pages and saved me from many an error. All mistakes that remain are my own.

Both the Research Committee and the Classics Department at Vas-sar College provided financial assistance whenever requested. My colleagues in Classics provided other, more intangible, support through their friendship, advice, and interest.

My greatest thanks go to Jane Livingston for her constant love, understanding, patience, and support. This book is dedicated to my parents, John and Sandra Lott, whose generosity and love have never failed.
